After years of planning, the city of Milwaukee has finally completed its first public works facility, a new $10-million building that will house the city's vehicle fleet, which has been scattered across several locations since 2008.

The current facility, which was built in 2006, has nearly 90,000 square feet of space and contains vehicles, trailers and equipment used by the city's public works department since 2008, including for public works projects, maintenance offices and other city departments.

"I don't know what our public works department would do without this," says Tom L. Johnson, director of the city's public works department. "The space we had before was scattered across several locations, and it was difficult to coordinate projects for the past seven years."

Johnson, who has been director of public works since 2011, says the department's needs have changed over time, and the city's public works department now employs about 100 people, up from 70 in 2008.

"Our employees deserve better facilities, especially considering the growth of our department," Johnson says. "We've been working hard to make sure our facilities are appropriate. We've made significant improvements to our facilities, especially the new facility, which was built in 2006. It's a great facility, and it's been well received by our employees."

"It's a great facility, and it's been well received by our employees," Johnson says. "It's a great facility, and it's been well received by our employees."
